TRENTON — From kids playing basketball and composing haiku-style poems to children receiving free backpacks and bonding with educators, the Back to School Academic Extravaganza on Friday brought hundreds of families together for a day of fun.

“This is one of the greatest events that occur in Trenton in the whole year,” said Alex Bethoa, a retired Trenton Public Schools vice principal and former city councilman. “Parents, teachers and administrators come together. It’s all about education.”

Bethoa said Trenton Public Schools must play a central role in revitalizing the capital city through curriculum and instruction. “If we fix education,” he said, “we will be fine.”

The fourth annual Back to School extravaganza featured free health and vision screenings under a lively atmosphere at the Trenton Board of Education building.

“This is a good pre-day for school,” Trenton Mayor Reed Gusciora said, “to get the kids motivated to go back to school.”

Trenton Public Schools had 2,300 open spots for the district’s preschool program and had 2,000 sign-up, Gusciora said at Friday’s extravaganza. “It looks like it’s a great success.”

As Gusciora circled through the event, he took a moment to acknowledge 7-year-old Samuel Francis, calling the local schoolboy a “celebrity.”

Samuel, who is entering second grade at Martin Luther King Elementary, said it was his second time meeting the newly elected mayor. He later reflected on the mayor’s comments, asking, “Can you be a celebrity without being rich?”

Students collectively received more than 2,000 free backpacks at the Trenton Public Schools event from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Friday. The event also gave city youth the opportunity to play pick-up, a tennis-style paddle sport, along with other engaging activities of the mind and body.

“This is a good thing for the community,” said William Che-noweth, Samuel’s grandfather.

City youth displayed their intellectual prowess Friday when they composed nature-themed haiku poems at the event. “Water preserves life. Water makes the soul rejoice. Life, water, happiness,” Trenton Mayor Reed Gusciora (left) and 7-year-old Samuel Francis enjoy the festivities at the Back to School Academic Extravaganza hosted by Trenton Public Schools Friday.

“That one really struck me,” Amanda Buchner, a Tulehaking Nature Center watershed fellow, said of the poem. “That was my favorite one today.”

The Tulehaking Nature Center is a Mercer County Park Commission facility located in the Abbott Marshlands of Hamilton Township. The center organized Friday’s poetry-writing activity, giving kids the tools and encouragement to create haikus.

“We have a ton of people doing haikus here,” Buchner said. “This is awesome.”

The water-themed poems will be collected and displayed at the Tulehaking Nature Center next month. The center, located at 157 Westcott Ave. in Hamilton, will feature the haikus in a free exhibit from noon to 3 p.m. Saturday, Sept. 15, as part of its River Days festivities.

Short by design, haikus are written in 17 syllables divided over three lines. “It’s probably the easiest poem you have,” Buchner said. “Since they are so short, you can really capture a moment.”

Barbara Flythe of the Trenton Literacy Movement provided information at the Back to School extravaganza highlighting Trenton’s literacy crisis. About 75 percent of children in elementary school in the City of Trenton do not read at grade level, according to the Trenton Literacy Movement, which funds after-school and summer programs that provide computer-aided literacy instruction.

“We are still raising money,” Flythe said, noting grade-level literacy in Trenton continues to lag far behind the surrounding suburbs. Trenton Literacy Movement, which is chaired by former Trenton Mayor Doug Palmer, wants to turn the tide on the city’s literacy crisis.

“With the new schools opening, Trenton’s first like school begins Sept. 6.”
